

The government is trying to take away your right to free or affordable legal representation if you're injured while cycling on the roads.

They've hidden the changes in a consultation about 'whiplash'. It means you won't have access to free legal support if you're injured on your bike.

The changes would restrict access to justice for nearly 1 million people, including anyone injured at work.

The government also admits that their one-sided proposals will:

- Cost the taxpayer £135m every year
- Cost the NHS £9m-13m every year
- Gift £200m in extra profit to car insurers every year.

Cyclists who are injured on the road have nothing to do with whiplash.
